Introduction

The first part of the book is devoted to a general survey of the history of the subject. It begins with a brief account of the early attempts to explain the phenomena of life, and then proceeds to a more detailed examination of the various theories which have been advanced from time to time. The author's object is to show that the true explanation of life lies in the laws of chemistry and physics, and that the vital forces are nothing more than the result of the action of these laws upon the matter of which life is composed.

In the second part of the book, the author discusses the various functions of life, and shows how they are all governed by the same laws. He begins with the process of nutrition, and then goes on to consider the functions of the nervous system, the reproductive system, and the system of circulation. In each case, he shows how the function is performed by the action of the laws of chemistry and physics upon the matter of which the function is composed.

The third part of the book is devoted to a discussion of the origin of life. The author begins by showing that life is not a necessary result of the action of the laws of chemistry and physics upon the matter of which life is composed. He then proceeds to show that life is a result of the action of the laws of chemistry and physics upon the matter of which life is composed, and that the origin of life lies in the laws of chemistry and physics.

The fourth part of the book is devoted to a discussion of the future of life. The author begins by showing that life is not a necessary result of the action of the laws of chemistry and physics upon the matter of which life is composed. He then proceeds to show that life is a result of the action of the laws of chemistry and physics upon the matter of which life is composed, and that the future of life lies in the laws of chemistry and physics.
